The wilderness is a harsh and unforgiving place. The winters are long and cold, and the summers are short and brutal. The land is unforgiving, and there is little food or water to be found. But despite the challenges, the castoffs have made the wilderness their home.

The castoffs are a diverse group of people. They come from all walks of life, and they have all been rejected by society in some way. Some of them are criminals, some are addicts, and some are simply people who don't fit in. But they all have one thing in common: they have been cast out and forgotten.

But in the wilderness, the castoffs have found a new sense of purpose. They have built a community where they can finally belong. They have learned to rely on each other, and they have learned to survive in the harsh conditions of the wilderness.

The castoffs' community is a simple one. They live in small cabins, and they grow their own food. They have a school for the children, and they have a place where they can meet and socialize.

The castoffs are not without their problems. They have to constantly be on the lookout for predators, and they have to deal with the harsh conditions of the wilderness. But despite the challenges, they have built a life for themselves in the wilderness.
