Grammar schools are state-funded schools that are selective in their admissions. This means that only a certain number of children are offered a place at each school, and the children who are offered a place are typically those who have achieved the highest scores in the Eleven Plus exam.

The Eleven Plus exam is divided into four sections: English, Maths, Verbal Reasoning, and Non-Verbal Reasoning. The English section tests children's reading comprehension, grammar, and spelling. The Maths section tests children's arithmetic, algebra, and geometry. The Verbal Reasoning section tests children's ability to understand and reason with words. The Non-Verbal Reasoning section tests children's ability to understand and reason with shapes and patterns.
