

The Civil War in Frederick County: A Journey Through History

Frederick County, Maryland, was a border county during the American Civil War. As such, it was the scene of significant military activity throughout the conflict. The county's location between the Union capital of Washington, D.C., and the Confederate capital of Richmond, Virginia, made it a strategic prize for both sides.

The Civil War began in April 1861, and Frederick County quickly became a battleground. In June 1861, Confederate forces under General Robert E. Lee invaded the county and occupied the town of Frederick. Union forces under General George B. McClellan soon arrived to drive out the Confederates. The two armies clashed in a series of battles throughout the county, including the Battle of South Mountain and the Battle of Antietam.

The Battle of Antietam, fought on September 17, 1862, was the bloodiest one-day battle in American history. Over 23,000 soldiers were killed, wounded, or captured. The battle ended in a draw, but it did persuade Confederate General Lee to withdraw his army from Maryland. This victory gave President Abraham Lincoln the opportunity to issue the Emancipation Proclamation, which freed slaves in Confederate-held territory.

Frederick County continued to be a battleground throughout the war. In June 1863, Confederate forces under General Jubal Early invaded the county and burned the town of Chambersburg, Pennsylvania. Union forces under General George Meade pursued Early's army and defeated it at the Battle of Monocacy. This victory prevented Early from invading Washington, D.C.

The Civil War ended in April 1865, and Frederick County was finally able to rebuild. The county's economy and infrastructure had been devastated by the war, but its people were determined to rebuild their lives.

Today, Frederick County is a thriving community. The county's history is still evident in its many historic sites, including the Antietam National Battlefield, the Monocacy National Battlefield, and the National Museum of Civil War Medicine. These sites offer visitors a chance to learn about the county's role in the Civil War and its impact on the nation.
